A Day in the life of Roald Dahl

Roald Dahl had a very strict daily routine. He would eat breakfast in bed and open his post. At 10:30 a.m. he would walk through the garden to his writing hut and work until 12 p.m. when he went back to the house for lunch – typically, a gin and tonic followed by Norwegian prawns with mayonnaise and lettuce. At the end of every meal, Ronald and his family had a chocolate bar chosen from a red plastic box.

After a snooze, he would take a flask of tea back to the writing hut and work from 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. He would be at the house at exactly six o'clock, ready for his dinner.

He always wrote in pencil and only ever used a very particular kind of yellow pencil with a rubber on the end. Before he started writing, Roald made sure he had six sharpened pencils in a jar by his side. They lasted for two hours before needing to be resharpened.

Roald was very particular about the kind of paper he used as well. He wrote all of his books on American yellow legal pads, which were sent to him from New York. He wrote and rewrote until he was sure that every word was just right. A lot of yellow paper was thrown away.

Once Roald had finished writing a book, he gave a pile of yellow scribbled paper to Wendy, his secretary, and she turned it into a neat printed manuscript to send to his publisher.

Roald Dahl wrote his books in a brick hut, which was built especially for him. It was painted white, with a yellow front door.

Some of the books that he wrote are turned into movies, such as: Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, Matilda, the Witches.

"Let's look for more clues!" says Tintin. Tintin and his dog Snowy walk home.

"Snowy, there is a treasure on the Unicorn. Let's look for it", says Tintin. "The ship is under the sea now, but where?"

Then Tintin sees a big car next to his house. There are some men too.

"Hello", says Tintin. Snowy doesn't like the men.

The men do not say hello. They are very rude.
